KNOW YOUR RIGHTS AFTER AN INCIDENT

Follow these three fundamental steps to safeguard your safety, evidence, and legal rights.

Step 1: Protect Yourself

Stay calm, avoid physical escalation, and state clearly that you wish to remain silent. Do not resist physically even if you believe the officer's actions are wrongful—preserve your physical safety first. Request medical attention immediately if injured.

Key rule: Safety & de-escalation first

Step 2: Document What Happened

Record or write down all details immediately: photos and videos of injuries, officer names, badge numbers, patrol vehicle unit numbers, witness contact information, and complete hospital/emergency room medical records.

Key rule: Never wash or alter physical evidence

Step 3: Speak With an Attorney

Stay calm, avoid physical escalation, and state clearly that you wish to remain silent. Do not resist physically even if you believe the officer's actions are wrongful—preserve your physical safety first. Request medical attention immediately if injured.

Key rule: Free & confidential consultation

FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS

Do I Have a Civil Rights Case?

You may have a claim if police, correctional staff, or government officials violated your constitutional or California civil rights. Common examples include excessive force, unlawful arrest, improper searches, denial of medical care, and custodial deaths.

What Should I Do After Police Misconduct?

Seek medical care, photograph injuries, preserve videos and clothing, save witness information, and write down what happened while details are fresh.

What Evidence Should I Preserve?

Keep photos, videos, medical records, witness contacts, citations, booking documents, court notices, and any surveillance footage. Preserve original files whenever possible.

How Long Do I Have to File a Claim?

California claims against government entities may have very short deadlines. In many cases, an administrative claim must be filed within 6 months of the incident.

What Happens After I Contact the Firm?

Conlogue Law will review your situation, available evidence, and potential claims during an initial confidential case evaluation.

How Much Does It Cost?

The initial case evaluation is free. If the firm can assist, the fee arrangement and next steps will be explained before moving forward.
